Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: ...ventured to restore the name as Pulo Gomus. The name is perhaps (MaL) Gamtis, hard, rough. old Arab navigators: These Islands support a numerous population. Both men and women go naked, only the women wear a girdle of the leaves of trees. When a ship passes near, the men come out in boats of various sizes and barter ambergris and coco-nuts for iron, a description which has applied accurately for many centuries. Rashiduddin writes of them nearly in the same terms under the name of Ldkvdram (but read Nakavaram) opposite Lamuri. Odoric also has a chapter on the island of Nicoveran, but it is one full of fable. (H. Thsang, III. 144 and 517; Relations, p. 8; Elliot, I. p. 71; Cathay, p. 97.) Mr. Phillips, from his anonymous Chinese author, gives a quaint legend as to the nakedness of these islanders. Sakya Muni, having arrived from Ceylon, stopped at the Islands to bathe. Whilst he was in the water the natives stole his clothes, upon which the Buddha cursed them; and they have never since been able to wear any clothing without suffering for it. The chief part of the population is believed to be of race akin to the Malays, but they seem to be of more than one race, and there is great variety in dialect. There have long been reports of a black tribe with woolly hair in the unknown interior of the Great Nicobar, and my friend Col. H. Man, when Superintendent of our Andaman Settlements, received spontaneous corroboration of this from natives of the former island, who were on a visit to Port Blair. Since this has been in type I have seen in the F. of India (July 28, 1874) notice of a valuable work by F. A. de Roepstorff on the dialects and manners of the Nicobarians. This notice speaks of an
